

For my reflection this week I drew a door (apologies for the lack of artistry). Having grown up with significant financial privilege, I have always had the monetary door open for me. My life has had difficulties in other ways, as a result of which I understand how difficult it is when one doesn't have a helping hand to pass through any of the doors of a balanced life. I have always felt like I should try to hold the financial door open for others, as that is usually where most people are tripped up. Since education can be the basis for most financial shots upward, this is why I chose to be a teacher, and hope to provide an equitable education to all people, no matter the demographic or background.
